THURSDAY, AUGUST 31, 1871. West Virginia in the Census. We are indebted to Francis A. Walk-En, Superintendent of the Census, for advance sheets of the Ninth Census, com-prising Table 11, the population of each majority of 84 against the convention. State and Territory by counties. There has been a ten Mile. gain in the aggregate since 1860 of 65,-346; in the colored, a loss of 3,124 It appears that the black population of the State was greater in 1850 than at any other period, the slaves then numbering 20,500 and the free 3,082, or 23,583 in all. In 1860 this had shrunk to 18,371 slaves (a loss of 2,129) and 2,773 free (a loss of 309.) precincts, in Nicholas county, give 121 The loss of this element began ten years before the war. During that period it was due to the extensive shipment of slaves southward and stringent legislation respecting the free blacks, which drove nany out of the State. But the loss of this element was more than ten times greater in the decade since 1860 than in the several townships of the county, a three one that preceded. This would seem turnished by the Clerk of the Board of to argue that West Virginia is not a con- Supervisors genial home for the negro and that being free to do so he is inclined to emigrate. It also affords an interesting commentary on some ideas that used to prevail hereabouts about the time the Congressional amendment to our present Constitution was under consideration. That amendment required us to strike out a provision of the Constitution forbidding the importation or immigration of black persons into the State, the Convention having inserted it partly out of deference to the slavery parout of deference to the slavery party, and partly from an apprehension that without such an embargo the new State would become a sort of negro colous. The Copperheads use to tell us, after this provision had been stricken out and a gradual emancipation clause substituted, gradual emancipation clause substituted. that if the Constitution were adopted the negroes would flock in from every quarter till the State would be overrun. How different the event, as we then told them
